

Peopletalk By Karen Feld

Negotiations to decide upon a location for the Reagan-Gorbachev breakfast set for Monday were more complicated than logistics for the summit. Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev wanted to meet at the Soviet consulate in San Francisco. Certainly that would be convenient for the former President who resides just a short hop away, near Los Angeles.

But Mr. Reagan's dilemma is one of protocol. Former presidents don't go to consulates. Reagan invited his Soviet pal to his ranch in Santa Barbara, but Gorby's advance men nixed that idea. Finally, they've agreed to hold the power breakfast in Northern California at former Secretary of State George Shultz's home at Stanford University. This will be the first time Mr. Reagan has visited Stanford since the university rejected the Reagan Library.

If you're hoping to catch a word with the ever busy and impatient talker Larry King, it's unlikely that you'll find him in the baggage area at an airport. When Larry travels, he Fed Exes his bags ahead so they'll be waiting for him in his hotel room.

While sipping brandy after a small and very elegant dinner at a Western European embassy, the host ambassador sheepishly asked the dinner partner of a gentleman named Philip Pillsbury, "What does Mr. Pillsbury do? We invited him because of the family name," confided the ambassador. That's diplomacy!

The summit spirit has captured Washington. The Omni Shoreham Hotel added the Gorbachev Cocktail to its menu: chilled Russian vodka with a splash of borscht, served in a potato skin. Naturally, it's followed by a Busch beer chaser.

Princess Astrid of Norway, King Olav's 58-year-old daughter, in town last week for the gala opening of an exhibit of Norwegian artist Edvard Munch's prints at the National Gallery of Art, didn't stop at cultural activities. The princess, who is married to Johann Marteinn Ferner, the owner of Norway's largest clothing store, visited the Lab School of Washington. The princess said she is dyslexic, and all five of her children are learning disabled as well. She wanted to see firsthand the teaching of youngsters with similar problems at this unique school.

Former Redskins running back John Riggins and his wife have separated. That's not surprising, if his regular behavior is anything like the night at a black-tie Washington press dinner when he was Supreme Court Justice Sandra O'Connor's dinner partner and fell asleep on the floor during the vice president's speech.

It used to be that fortunate youngsters brushed up on waterskiing and softball and sang songs around the campfire at summer camp in Maine. No longer. At least not if you're the offspring of a power broker. Washington lawyers are shipping their young aspiring lawyers off to Law Prep in Miami Shores, Fla., for a three-week session. Counselors are attorneys. They'll provide a beginning legal education. Field trips aren't to local beaches, but rather to a crime lab, county jail and courtroom. Not to worry. Tennis and swimming is thrown in for diversion.

Janis Johnson is on vacation. Her "Washington Peopletalk" column will resume next Thursday.